AN ANGRY TEENAGER

Uri wrote to Dan Miller's advice column in the newspaper. Here is Uri's letter and the answer Dan wrote.

Dear Dan,

I am a new driver. I got my license last summer. I know my parents worry about my driving, but they shouldn't worry. I drive very carefully. If I go to a party, I don't take the car.

But still my parents don't trust me. They recently put an electronic device in the car that shows them where I am at any time. If I go too far from home, the device sends a message to my parents. They can also control how fast I drive and even how loud my radio is. In fact, the radio doesn't work if I don't use my seat belt.

I feel I don't have any freedom. I'm not a child anymore. I'm very responsible and never do anything dangerous. What can I do to make my parents trust me?

An angry teenager,

Uri

15 Dear Uri,

I understand that you are very angry with your parents. But you must understand that they are only worried about you because they love you. They know that many young drivers don't have enough experience. These drivers often make mistakes that cause road accidents. Your parents also know that sometimes teenagers drive too fast or take chances to impress their friends.

I think that you should talk to your parents and agree on some rules together. One thing you could do is promise that you won't send or look at text messages while you're driving. You could also promise to call them when you stop driving. This way they'll know you're OK. Maybe if they know you are following these rules, they won't watch you all the time.

I hope this helps.

Drive safely,

Dan
